Effective Study 101

Are your study habits as effective as they can be? Many students begin to realize that what they were doing in high school isn't good enough for college. And really, college is quite different from high school. No more cod-dling. The professors are not as personally involved, class size is much larger, exams are more critical consequences, a lot more intense reading and the classes are definitely more rigorous. So how do you get around this and become more effective?

Check out the below strategies:

Time Management:

- Start using a calendar/planner/task list at the beginning of the term.
- Write down important dates of exams/assignments/projects in your calendar.
- Make a weekly/monthly schedule to access how you are doing time-wise (busy time/free time).
- To-do-list to keep track of things on a daily basis.
- Use short breaks in your daily schedule for appointments/check emails/review class notes, etc.
- Pay attention to what makes you procrastinate and keep it to a minimum, especially in high stress times.
- Plan for some enjoyment time. It will keep you balanced.
- Be patient and flexible. Be open to alternate strategies. It will help you keep your sanity.

Listening and notetaking:

- Go to class...there is no substitute.
- Check into what material from lectures will be on the exam.
- Go to class prepared with lecture notes, reading assigned material. You will be better prepared for class discussions and asking meaningful questions.
- Apply active listening skills, comparing what you hear in the lecture to what you heard in previous lectures and in the textbook.
- Sit up front so you can hear and see without distractions.
- Organize your notes after the lecture and review your notes on a weekly basis.

Textbook Reading:

- Summarize and take notes to help you understand and retain information.
- Review the notes on a regular basis. Align the textbook notes with lecture notes.

Exam Preparation:

- Locate a couple of good study spaces.
- Review course outline for information that will be on the exam.
- Review past quizzes, assignments, papers, labs etc. Pinpoint where you have had difficulty. Make sure you understand the material.
- Write out practice exams on the material. Look @ your library.
- Study in small chunks of time. Two hour sections with 15 minute break.
- Group studies are good. Keep a regular schedule
- During exam ... focus on what you know.
- After the exam, follow up with the instructor. See what you can improve for the next time.
