You don’t have to be super stressed out when it comes to test time. Here are a few simple ways to get thoroughly prepared for tests...and stay calm while you are taking them.

SCHEDULE STUDY TIME - Trying to cram in all your studying the night before the test is really impossible. The strategy of trying to master all the material the night before the BIG TEST will not only make you super tired but really stressed out. The better alternative is to schedule study time every day for several days before the test. Psychologists tell us that this strategy helps you store important information in your memory for the day of the test. The night before the test should be spent reviewing the information you already know and practice what you have learned.

USE YOUR TIME WISELY - Before you begin studying, get rid of any distractions, clear your desk of electronics, games and your phone. Also, make sure you have all the supplies you need so you do not lose focus. Make sure you build in small breaks while you are studying for snacks, nature breaks and/or play a quick computer game to relieve the tension if your head is about ready to explode.

FORM A STUDY GROUP - Studying with other people can help you better understand the material and learn from others. Putting together or joining a study group before a test can be a great way to review what you have learned by splitting up the material into more manageable sections. Each person or pair should take a section of the material and create a study sheet plus questions and flashcards for the group. - Continued on column 2
